- In the short term, we can expect overall vacancy rates to rise and average selling prices to decline. With business activity curtailed, we may see a slowdown in unit purchases.
- Compared to early 2020, the number of purchases dropped by 60 percent during the COVID-19 restrictions.

- Given the government's recent efforts to contain the virus, we expect to see purchasing activity recover in the medium-term.
- Despite the market decline, prices haven't dropped significantly and transactions are still made over the counter. The online expos have helped the market to pick up.
